

Managing People and Trees: Priorities, Compromises and Differences

Woburn Abbey 25th June 2008

Subject

The seminar will provide important information to anyone who has responsibility for or has practical involvement in the care and maintenance of trees in: highways, parks, or woodlands with a high degree of public access.

When the activities of people come into close contact with trees there is often a perception of negative issues that affect both trees and people. These are rarely balanced with the positive benefits that can be gained.

Worries over the damage trees might cause can often be over emphasised and human activities are sometimes given an over inflated priority.

This seminar will examine: practical methodologies to avoid damage to trees; methods for assessing and reducing risk from trees and the need for tree work; and balancing risk against heritage and landscape value.

Speakers

Brian Crane, Avenue management.

Dr Marcus Bellett-Travers, Assessment of linear highway features..

Andrew Cowan, Tree roots and people.

Ted Green (TBC) The heritage value of trees, a powerful tool.
